I don't think that long. You could use one of those "build your own website" services, probably set up a rudimentary imageboard in 2 weeks or so. 1 if fast learner or lots of free time.

A friend and I made one from scratch with a bit of help from stackoverflow and a tutorial for the start. Not really used now but it's really lightweight and has a lot of the same features of *chans, along with some different stuff like an autism voting feature for users. You need an account to see anything too, so it's not really anonymous 100% but it keeps randoms out. Basically the interface is a mix of gamefaqs forums, *chans, and modern web design without the faggotry.

It took a few months of working on it every now and then, mostly because of time testing and finding little bugs that happened with the way we were handling the POST data of the replies.

all boards are nsfw though blue boards still have their original purpose as to not let threads devolve into porn dumps get rid of janitors
board specific mods depending on resources public bans
have to lurk 2 years before you're allowed to post. this is obviously not actively enforced but obvious newfags would get year long ban so they have time to lurk.

ofc this is irrelevant because imageboards are made by their users and convincing enough people to migrate into yours is impossible as not even cripplechan succeeded.

Bad business model so I would do everything differently from when I tried to host one.

Image serving is expensive even if the images aren't persisted and deleted from storage after threads die. Have to hire staff to deal with DCMA takedown requests and illegal threads. Moderation is what makes anonymous social apps and networks very operationally expensive.

Only thing keeping 4chan afloat are the number of autists that buy the $20
4chan Pass. 4chan is one of the biggest and most well known communities on the internet, its namebrand is what makes it exist.

You will shut down your imageboard after 2 months when hosting expenses exceed $2000/mo cause those furfag and webm threads are eating up terrabytes cloud storage each thread and you're getting an email every 2 minutes to take something down or go to jail/get sued.

So if anyone has suggestions to what would solve the above problems I would suggest listening to that.

What about just a community moderated imageboard? Little to no moderation, all boards NSFW. Perhaps an auto-ban system in place based on user reports. And ask users to donate processing power to host the imageboard. No business model, just a small open source community project.

I would have a reddit style voting system and also dedicated furry boards

Using the voting system or trying to post on the furry boards instantly bans you, but it presents a cloudflare (or whatever CDN) error page saying the server is down so they don't realise they've been banned.

I've been thinking a lot about "next generation" of imageboard features but can't really make any new features up.

this assumes my imageboard would reach popularity levels equal to 4chan... (unlikely)

I would:

A) Hire a competent moderation team of at least 50 moderators who would be dedicated to keeping the imageboard clean of assorted trash.
B) Develop accounts and make having an account a required feature, except usernames are not displayed and only used to login to your account. Appearance-wise, everyone is still anonymous.
C) Develop 2-3 new-member boards where every new IP that had visited my imageboard only once would only be allowed to post on these new boards until they 'unlocked' the main boards after some time.

This allows my team to have actual power over shitposters, and bans are worth a lot more. When the threat of a perma ban is very real, and you can't just reset your IP and go back to being a dipshit 2 minutes later, it would stop a lot of people from ruining the website.

The real issue with 4chan is that its way too popular for its own good. Popular fast moving boards have destroyed pretty much all civil conversation because no one want to put any effort into their post when its probably going to be on page 10 in a few minutes. This is why shit-posting is the accepted norm because its far more attractive to do because of the low effort involved.
Throwing more moderators, captcha, automation, post timers hasn't worked.

The userbase has overwhelmed what the software was designed to do and has never grown to accommodate.
